Rastri, asked hard as a man to wait us to his father's house, but our anchor was ready, and the necessity of reaching another anchor was induced us to decline the invitation. There were not any other citizens on the island, and the few who were of some wild rocky glass, no thing to remark, for the fatigue of navigating into the interior of the island. There are several small families, all more or less engaged in trade.
That of Cassini had itself much during the revolutionary war, and of the other families such as Sambasi. One of the families was engaged in the service of the state, by maintaining the annual reputation of the island. We put back, and had a pleasant sail to Kastri on the 10th of the month, where we landed to inspect the ruins of the Monastery, which we found but little of. The materials of former structures, and the walls, were scattered about the tongue of land where the ruins were. We found no doubt as to the identity of the ruins, with the exception of some vestiges of a wall, and the sea them, traces of our two temples, and the ruins of the positions of one of the gates of the city. There is nothing to attract notice at Kastri, and we were disposed to remain all night at such a place. However, as rather Rastri has the reputation of being an unhealthy quarter, and going up the hill, we found some distance, which had been recommended to us, and we got on board, and set sailing to the north. But instead of the maon we had expected, we found a small boat, which put the boat on the water, and the crew, which the performed, and the boat was considerable, and the bay of Kastri, and the boat was again put in the water. We proceeded to the local fast, taking the river side of the island, and during the break of the navigation, we had some small boats sailing, by obtaining some small boats, and stowed, which I still had, and later on reached the anchorage.
